Consulting Projects Manager

In her role as a consulting projects manager, Chloe Byers brings a range of nonprofit experiences and skills to the Dini Partners firm. She has worked on fundraising and marketing campaigns for organizations including the Smithsonian National Museum of Natural History, the South Carolina Aquarium and the American College of the Building Arts.

In her most recent role at the Smithsonian, Chloe worked in the museum's Development and External Affairs office and assumed roles in donor cultivation and stewardship, grants management, fundraising communications and international programs. During this time, she worked on a new museum professional education strategy for the Smithsonian Institution. Chloe served on a team of museum experts, consultants and leadership to develop international museum professional education training programs and best practices workshops for museums and cultural organizations around the world. One of the first projects focused on the development of an education strategy to encourage cultural sector awareness in the United Arab Emirates.

After graduating from the College of Charleston, Chloe joined a newly formed nonprofit, the American College of the Building Arts. She gained extensive experience in nonprofit operations and developed a wealth of knowledge regarding fundraising, event management and foundation and government relations.

During her role at the South Carolina Aquarium, she worked to promote messages of interactive learning to families in regional markets across the Southeast. Her responsibilities included advertising and public relations campaign development, project management and relationship cultivation with corporate partners and media. She helped launch popular new exhibits, including an educational camping-themed exhibit and an interactive children's play area.

Originally from New York City, Chloe's interest in nonprofit organizations stems from her dedication to human services, education and the environment. She has been an active volunteer in a number of nonprofit organizations in New York, Charleston, South Africa and Washington, DC.
